This portrait of William Randolph Hearst by himself has been put together out of the enormous accumulation of letters, telegrams, memoranda, and editorial columns through which he built and ran the most sensational newspaper empire in American history. Just before he died in 1951, he turned his records over to one of his colleagues who has assembled from them this picture of one of the most powerful, most hated, most feared, and most inconsistent personalities of our times. It is a story of the last fifty years, told by a man who did as much to shape them, for good or for evil, as any newspaper publisher of his generation.
