Many bats, like the Mariana Flying Fox, are pollinators and seed-carriers that help propagate our plant population. Others, such as Townsend's big-eared bat, keep insect numbers in check by consuming mass quantities of bugs, saving farmers billions of dollars annually in avoided pesticide use. And still other bats, like Hardwicke's wooly bat, nurture plant life with the nitrogen in their droppings. Take a close look at these tiny eco-warriors and you'll see just how incredible they are.
